Over the past fifteen years, a rapid growth in the number of studies of social movements, new social movements and urban social movements can be observed. In Latin America in particular, research on urban movements has occupied a prominent place among the studies of popular mobilization. Assessments of the significance of these movements have ranged from dismissing them as rather irrelevant, since they do not directly address the class structure of society and lack real political influence, to their glorification as 'the new subjects for societal transformation'. The bewildering number of studies in this area often leaves students at a loss. This book traces the development and impact of some of the theoretical perspectives involved. Rather than providing ready-made solutions, the intention is to review the emergence of the questions under debate in a systematic way. It is only through an understanding of why things are questioned and in what context questions have become relevant, that an assessment of the debates on the different types of social movements becomes possible. This in turn, provides the basis for further progress in this field of study. The book provides a general discussion of theoretical perspectives and research strategies in the study of social movements and situates the debates on urban movements in Latin America within this broad context. A bibliographical overview of studies on Latin American movements and their thematical indexation provides a valuable aid to students of the subject.

The Centre for Latin American Research and Documentation (CEDLA) conducts and coordinates social science research on Latin America, publishes and distributes the results of such research, and assembles and makes accessible documentary and scholarly materials for the study of the region. The Centre also offers an academic teaching programme on the societies and cultures of Latin America.

The authors are currently working on research projects on urban movements in various Latin American countries. Ton Salman is working on a research project in Santiago, Chile; Gerrit Burgwal is conducting research on neighborhood organizations in Quito, Ecuador; and Willem Assies is studying urban movements in Recife, Brazil.
